General Comment

An individual's access to affordable contraception is one of the greatest enablers of advancement in society. Forcing people to have children they don't want, whether through legislating against contraception or through making it financially difficult to obtain it, is at best delusionally evil and at worst maliciously evil. Both for the many unwilling parents and the scores of unwanted children in this world, these issues should be approached pragmatically.

Bottom line, people will have sex, they always have; and a child never had is much better off than a child had who wasn't wanted. People who don't want to be parents should be afforded every opportunity to keep themselves from becoming ones.
